There are many books, articles, journals, etc., that you can choose from because the library is a pack of variety. Choose a nice place in your nearest library where the environment is peaceful, and you are away from any distractions to focus on your topic and do the necessary research. You can also use computers or the internet if available to make study more accessible.

The next step is to choose your research topic. Be careful in choosing your research topic. If you can select the issue by yourself, make sure to take advantage of that, select a topic you are interested in, or a topic you want to know about. This way, you can be more interested in searching about your case, avoiding common issues. A topic that is too basic or is used continuously does not attract the reader. Be specific about selecting your subject and be passionate about it.

The next step is to note down the notes correctly. As said before, be organized; writing down letters means writing down points that will help you in your research article. You can use sticky notes which come in different colors; it will make you love your work. Highlight the necessary parts. Take ideas from any book or article and note that point in your notes.

Make a good journal. It will save your time when you start writing the final draft, as you already have all the material in your rough notes. Every time you are writing something from a book or article, write down the list of necessary references such as the author, the book title, page numbers, publisher's name, and important dates.

After all the research that you made, you can move forward to writing an outline. With the help of all the notes and essential information you collected, start thinking about where those topics can fit in. You do not necessarily have to construct sentences of the outlines that you created. Carefully pick what part can be used in the beginning, middle and end. This way, your research paper starts to construct its actual image.

Now move on to making the first draft. The first draft means to write your essay in a rough form. Sometimes your first draft ends up being your final one. You can start working on your first draft by getting help from the outlines that you created, and put sentences into a proper structure. Otherwise, you can also
